The Monkey and the Hawk.

The cook of a French milieuen whose chateau is in the south of France, had a monkey which was allowed the five range of the kitchen, and which was so intelligent, that by pretty severe training his natural propensity to mischief had been subdued, and he was even taught to perform certain useful services, such as plucking fowls, for instance, at which he was unusually expert.

One fine morning, a pair of partridges was given to the monkey to pluck. The creature took them to an open window of the kitchen which looked directly upon the court, and went to work with great diligence. He soon finished one, which he laid on the outer edge of the window, and then went quietly on with the other. A hawk which had been watching his proceedings from a neighbouring tree, darted down upon the plucked partridge and in a few minutes was up to the tree, eagerly devouring his prey. The consternation of the monkey at this unoward adventure may be easily imagined. He would be severely whipped for losing it. He hopped about in great distress for some moments when suddenly a bright thought struck him. Seizing the remaining partridge he went to work with seven energy and stripped off the feathers. He then laid it on the edge just where he placed the other, and closing one of the shutters, concealed him behind it.

The hawk, which by this time had finished his meal, very soon swooped down upon the partridge; but hardly had his claws touched the bird when the monkey sprang upon him from behind the shutter. The hawk's head was instantly wrung, and the monkey with a triumphant chuckle proceeded to strip off the feathers. This done, he carried the two plucked fowls to his master, with a confident and self-satisfied air, which seemed to say: "Here are two birds, sir, just what you gave me." What the cook said on finding one of the partridges converted into a hawk is more than we are able to tell.

It is but a legend, I know—A Bible, a phantom, a show.

Of the vision, Rabbished here; Yet the old medieval tradition.

The beautiful, strange superstition,

That hangs us, and holds us there.

When I look from my window at night,

And the walk above is all white.

All throbred and panting with stars,

Among them majestic is standing

Sandalphon the Angel, expanding

His pinions in nubious bars.

And he gathers the prayers as he stands,

And they change into flowers in his hands,

Into garlands of purple and red;

And beneath the great arch of the portal,

Through the streets of the City Imperial,

I waited the fragrance they shed.

It is but a legend, I know—

A Bible, a phantom, a show.

Of the vision, Rabbished here;
